Why is it significant?

Lucknow is historically significant as grand transitional late Victorian and Edwardian residence erected between c.1895-1900, following the 1888 subdivision of the Millicent Estate. Connected to the 1880s land boom, which saw urban character changes and a period of rapid subdivision of Victorian estates and development across the City of Stonnington, Lucknow forms a tangible link to the late Victorian subdivision story of Toorak, and illustrates the suburb's growing upper-middle class towards the turn of the 20th century. (Criterion A)

Lucknow is aesthetically significant as a visually striking residence that seamlessly incorporates features from both the late Victorian and Edwardian styles. Key features contributing to its aesthetic value include a hipped and gabled roof form with profiled chimneys, terracotta tiles and decorative finials, a bay window with a parapet and festoon mouldings, a wraparound verandah with ground floor arched loggia and upper floor timber balustrade defined by a quatrefoil design and a turned slatted timber valance, and decorative gable ends with rough cast render, timber battens and moulded ornamentation. (Criterion E)
